Category:Ballistics Category:Ballistic testing Approximately three-fourths of the earth's surface is covered by water. Of this, over 70 percent is aqueous and is divided into fresh water (e.g., lakes, rivers, etc.) and saline water (e.g., seas). Fresh water is an available resource in large quantities, but only about 10-20% of the fresh water is readily accessible for use, due to the difficulties involved in moving fresh water from the remote sources where it is produced. As is well known, fresh water contains a variety of dissolved gases and semi-dissolved gases, primarily hydrogen, oxygen, nitrogen and carbon dioxide. These gases, which are typically obtained from the atmosphere during formation of the fresh water from surface sources of water, are often in excess of the dissolved solids and are available in sufficient amounts to permit their separation from the fresh water. Where existing fresh water sources are not near the point of consumption, it is often necessary to transport the water over great distances to be consumed. This is typically accomplished by the use of large conventional pressure-driven pumps through a supply piping network of sufficient length to bring the water from the source of production to the point of consumption. A general object of this invention is to provide a means for transporting fresh water to a distant consumption point without the necessity for the use of large pumps. A more specific object of this invention is to provide a means for transporting 3da54e8ca3
