In the basic form, the database server is standalone, it needs its own database and there are plenty of shared resources. However, in my case, the application is multi-tier, the database server is installed in the application server(web server). So, there will be only single database server instance and multiple applications that need to use it. If I use MS SQL Server as the database server, then I would need to put it in the application server machine? Not sure about how the MS SQL Server model works in this scenario. A: You can run multiple instances of SQL Server on a single machine. That's the simplest model. For a typical two-server installation, the second machine contains an instance named instance1. You can run multiple instances of SQL Server on a single machine with a single instance database. Each of those instances will have its own dedicated instance database. You can run multiple instances of SQL Server on a single machine with a shared instance database. This is an advanced model that's basically only available in the enterprise editions of SQL Server. Each of those instances will have the same instance database. The instances are all running on the same machine. You can also run multiple instances of study explores affective mental states (mood) in mothers of 6- and 12-month-olds. Mother-child interaction was observed in three conditions: full presence, voice only, and no voice. Mothers' affective states were measured using microanalytic coding of vocalization during 15-s episodes of interaction. Affective vocalizations were coded in relation to a 3-point scale for negative, positive, or neutral affect. These nonverbal emotional displays demonstrated large and statistically significant differences across children's ages, with older mothers showing more positive affect and less negative affect relative to younger mothers. Furthermore, children's affective vocalizations were influenced by the mother's condition and children's age: Positive affect was more frequent in the presence than the absence of the mother, older children were more likely to vocalize positive affect, and negative affect was more common in the absence than presence of the mother. Findings suggest that long-term factors interact with recent affective experiences to shape the speech-cued expression of affective mental states in mothers and their infants.
